Editorial

Nigel Shanks

To insure or not to insure, that is the question. For us here at CP and ACS, the answer to that question is fairly simple – always insure. On a day to day basis we're dealing not only with the significant value of our own stock but also often quite eye watering amounts for single items or collections in for valuation and of course vendor consignments to our Public Auctions. Unlike some firms, we don't on charge insurance to vendors, preferring to view it as simply a cost of doing good business - of course insurance cover also has the fringe benefit of peace of mind.

The question of insurance for private collectors however is a little more complex and there are of course multiple considerations, not least of all cost. Most of the below comment is pretty straight forward and will be nothing all that new to most CP Newsletter clients – however it is always a good idea to re-evaluate your own situation from time to time to make sure what you have been doing is right for what you should be doing into the future, especially if your circumstance have changed. Maybe you've been spending a lot more recently or maybe you've moved. Or perhaps you've recently sold a big part of your collection.

Do I even need insurance?

Everyone has a different set up. Some have state of the art security systems with security cameras, monitored alarms and possibly even private security patrols with collections kept in fire-proof, temperature-controlled vaults. Others may have just one or two security options with maybe a safe and others still may have nothing but a box or two in the top cupboard or a few albums in a locked cabinet in the study. A bit like deciding whether to invest in the stock market or not, it is all about your appetite for risk. Some may be happy having a 1d Claret in the top cupboard while others will want their collection of NZ Post year books in an 8 hour fire rated safe with full insurance. From a collector perspective, the way I approach insurance, is to think about how upset I'd be if the material was totally lost – say by flood, fire or theft. If the answer is anything more than pretty upset then I'd be taking steps to at the very least to ensure that it was kept in a secure place and likely would carefully be considering security and insurance.

How much is the collection worth?

A great starting point is to come up with an accurate value of your collection in the current market. This will enable you to decide if the collection is even worth ensuring and from there assist your insurer with premium calculations. Some collectors keep receipts for items they have purchased, others (like me) prefer to forget about the price paid as fast as possible and just enjoy the new addition to their collection.

Whatever type of collector you are it's probably a good idea to keep some sort of a record somewhere of what you have paid for items – even if only for what you see as the 'big spends'. Of course, if you've not bought in a while the records of amounts paid become less relevant. In this instance start with a catalogue and/or go to a trusted dealer for an insurance valuation. Bear in mind dealers will generally charge for their time for an insurance valuation. However, this is money well spent as a reputable dealer's letter stating details and value of the collection is generally looked on favourably by insurers who must take into account the many variables around condition and catalogue versus market value when considering a claim.

Some insurers may ask for scans or copies of key (expensive) items and although somewhat annoying to do at the time, these can be valuable come claim time. The more information you have on the contents of your collection, the harder it will be for an insurance claim to be denied.

Choosing an insurer

There are a number options for philatelic insurance and getting it is generally fairly straight forward, just don't rely on your standard house and contents insurance paying out on your stamp collection without confirmation in writing from your insurer. Perhaps the biggest international name in philatelic insurance is H W Wood and with offices around the world can assist most collectors with a quote. Closer to home in New Zealand is AON who we now use for our philatelic insurance at both CP and ACS and who are underwritten by Liberty through Lloyds in the UK. Chubb Insurance (also with a New Zealand office) can provide philatelic insurance as part of their fine arts household policy. Contact details for the three are below for those who may wish to follow up:

H W Wood

Chubb New Zealand

www.chubb.com/nz-en

AON New Zealand

www.aon.co.nz

email michael.caulton@aon.com

I'd always recommend talking to your home and contents insurer first and seeing if they can provide cover. If the value is less than $100,000.00 this is quite often straight forward and the collection will be listed on your policy for what is normally a modest increase in your premium. For values over $100,000.00 you will likely find that it may be best to approach one of the specialist philatelic insurers for a quote. And of course, like anything in life, it pays to shop around and never more so than with insurance – read the fine print.

A Final Thought

Whether you insure or not, everything still comes back to making sure you do your best to protect and look after your material – be it from fire, flood, dampness or theft. Insurance can take away some of the pain of total loss depending on your collecting interests. Those with stamps can often use the funds to replace, those with postal history items can have a tougher time and may use an insurance payout to change their collecting interests.
